

Fellowships

Maternity Care Fellowship

The fellowship in family-centered maternity care prepares family physicians to provide prenatal, intrapartum, postpartum, and newborn care. Required rotations include obstetrical ultrasound, high-risk obstetrics, neonatology, and labor & delivery, with options for electives such as genetics, infertility, and reproductive health. The one-year fellowship includes a special focus on the needs of patients and families in the context of health inequities.

Reproductive Health Fellowship

The two-year fellowship in Reproductive Health and Family Planning aims to develop family physicians as clinical, research, and policy leaders in the intersection of family medicine and planning.

Fellows focus on integrating reproductive health care into comprehensive family medicine services. To this end, they maintain an active family medicine practice at Montefiore's family medicine teaching sites; train family physicians in IUD and implant insertion, management of miscarriage, and abortion; and provide family planning services and training at freestanding high-volume clinics. Finally, fellows complete a 1-3 month international placement to learn about family planning, abortion, and reproductive health in less-developed areas.

During the two-year fellowship, fellows also complete a Master of Public Health at Columbia University. Each fellow is actively involved with developing and implementing at least one research project, and presenting findings at regional and national meetings. Many fellows have had manuscripts on their projects published in peer-reviewed journals.
