Dr. McMullen is from Denver. She received her undergraduate degree in Anthropology from Rice University in Houston, Texas. Following graduation she worked for a non-profit agency that promotes public health in Latin America. After traveling all over Latin America and becoming fluent in Spanish, she realized there was no place like home, so she returned to Denver where she attended the University of Colorado School of Medicine and residency at Saint Joseph Hospital. She joined the residency faculty in 2010 where she is the associate director of the Maternity Care Fellowship and leads the Colorado Lactation Journal Club.

Her clinical interests include perinatal care and obstetrics, lactation, infant and pediatric care, women's health, family planning, minor procedural care and ultrasound, and care of people without health insurance. She strives to help mothers and children receive healthcare and recommendations that meet their social, emotional, as well as physical needs. She hopes to take time to learn about her patient's as whole people, including the circumstances in which they live and work and that affect their health. When she isn't working, she is either busy with her duties as a mom, spending time with family, running, swimming, knitting, reading or enjoying her husband's outstanding cooking.
