Father Daughter Team Brag How They Travel the Country Killing Babies in Abortions

A 78-year-old abortionist and his daughter bragged about moving their families to new states to keep aborting unborn babies in an interview with Reuters this week.

The report suggested the two are heroes who are making big sacrifices to help women in need — when really they are making money off vulnerable, often desperate women by selling the deaths of their unborn babies as a solution to their problems.

For decades, Alan Braid, 78, aborted unborn babies in Texas. His daughter, Andrea Gallegos, 40, told Reuters that she grew up "in awe of her father's" work and eventually began running an abortion facility herself in Oklahoma.

Then, two years ago, the U.S. Supreme Court changed everything. Both father and daughter were living in Texas when it became the first state since Roe v. Wade to be allowed to enforce a previability ban on elective abortions. Oklahoma came next a few months later, and then the high court overturned Roe in the Dobbs v. Jackson decision last summer.

Braid and Gallegos could have stayed in Texas and Oklahoma to provide much-needed maternity, prenatal and postpartum care to mothers and babies. Instead, they decided to travel to new states to sell elective abortions.

Here's more from the report:

After Roe, Reuters documented their days spent in airports and weeks living out of suitcases.

Braid, 78, had fewer afternoons watching his grandchildren play with the golf simulator in his garage, and Gallegos, 40, missed taking her children to karate practice. ...

"I don't think I ever really thought about quitting," [Braid said]. "My motivation is to provide a safe place for women to come who have made the decision to terminate their pregnancy."

According to the report, Braid recently opened a new abortion facility in Albuquerque, New Mexico where pregnant women travel from Texas and other pro-life states for abortions.

His daughter followed in her father's footsteps and opened another new abortion facility in Carbondale, Illinois where her father also travels to abort unborn babies.

Still living in Texas, Gallegos said she flies back and forth and mainly sees her husband and children via video calls while she runs the new abortion facility. But she considers the sacrifice worth it.

"I know now more than ever that this is exactly where I was supposed to be," Gallegos said of her abortion work.

Her father and mother recently moved from Texas to New Mexico, a state that allows unborn babies to be aborted for any reason up to birth and forces taxpayers to pay for their deaths. Braid told Reuters that he looks forward to his grandchildren visiting and playing a golf simulator together.

Next month, Gallegos's family is planning to move to Illinois so she, too, can be with her children more while she helps abort other mothers' unborn children, according to the report.

But Braid and Gallegos are not heroes. Abortions do not fix problems; they just destroy unborn babies' lives and leave women to continue to fend for themselves. A new study found two-thirds of women who had abortions said they wanted support, not abortions, and would have chosen life for their unborn babies if they had had it. Additionally, one in four women said their abortions were "unwanted or coerced."

Meanwhile, pro-life advocates are trying to increase support to help these struggling mothers, making sure they have the resources to live and thrive.
